Loss Scenario A.

There is a defect in the solar module resulting in the performance efficiency to drop below 90% within 12 years after the date of shipment. The power plant operator is unable to fulfil their contract with the utility to supply promised levels of energy output to meet demands. The utility company claims for compensation because they have to source replacement energy from a more expensive supplier to meet demands.

E&O Policy Response.

If the policy is in force when the claim for compensation is made, the economic injury sustained by the organisation (the utility) because their property (the power plant) is less useful and was caused by a defect in the ULICA product, the E&O policy would respond. The E&O policy would not pay for the full replacement cost of the energy; however, it would pay for the increased cost of the replacement energy.

Loss Scenario B

The private power plant operator received green energy tax credits from the local government based upon the clean energy that they are producing. The tax credits are based upon predicted performance output levels and have been pre-sold or traded by the power plant with other less clean businesses. There is a defect in the solar module resulting in the performance efficiency to drop below 90% within 12 years after the date of shipment and as a result they receive less tax credits. The power plant operator is unable to fulfil their contract with the other less clean businesses resulting in a loss of revenue. They seek compensation for the loss of revenue against ULICA.

E&O Policy Response.

If the policy is in force when the claim for compensation is made, the economic injury sustained by the organisation (the power plant operator) because their property (the tax credits) are useless or less useful and was caused by a defect in the ULICA product, the E&O policy would respond. The E&O policy would pay for the lost revenue resulting from the contract breach with the less clean businesses.

The loss scenario examples are descriptive only. Actual coverage is subject to the language of the policies as issued. In the event of inconsistency between the information set out above and under Policy No. 93518615. The terms and conditions of the relevant policy will always prevail.
